INTRODUCTION

Although it has been possible to assemble about seven hundred names given to places in Tasmania by the Aborigines, mostly from the journals and other records of George Augustus Robinson, few of them have been applied to the same place by the settlers who later renamed places in Tasmania according to their own whims.

This situation is unlike that found in most other regions of Australia, where there is a sprinkling of Aboriginal names among the settlers' names, which are usually those of British places and people. The paucity of Aboriginal place names in Tasmania was, in fact, commented upon many years ago, when the Sydney Colonist of 14 April, 1838, remarked -

Whereas every district of New South Wales is quite studded with native names, yet in Van Diemen's Land the Editor "could not find after diligent enquiry, that a single locality in all Van Diemen's Land is known to the colonist by its ancient native name, or is even known to have had a native name at all. The ancient Celts and Britons left ten thousand aboriginal names of places in England and Scotland when they were nearly exterminated in the low countries and driven to the mountains of Scotland and Wales by our forefathers the Saxons. But so complete has been the extermination in Van Diemen's Land that the Aborigines of that island have left not a single wreck behind them, not even nominis umbris, the shadow of a name!"

The only Tasmanian comment on this paucity of Aboriginal names which has been seen, was a letter from J.E. Calder in the Mercury in March 1880, in which he urged the propriety of using such names of rivers, districts, mountains and so on, whenever they could be found, instead of the inappropriate English designations; and he drew attention to the widespread use of Aboriginal place names in the other Australian colonies.

There were, however, difficulties in applying Aboriginal place names in Tasmania, of which the principal one was the almost total want of real communication between Aboriginal and settler, and this was coupled with a lack of interest on the part of the settlers in anything relating to the life of the Aborigines. As a result, Aboriginal place names were not recorded. G.A. Robinson's records did not become available for study until 1950, and as a result almost the only repository of records of place names was the short list given by Joseph Milligan (1859); and when Aboriginal words of various meanings came to be used in naming small towns, there was no other ready source of them but his vocabulary. Both these were the product of his experience at the Flinders Island Aboriginal Settlement, and both of them have a number of defects.

Few of Milligan's place names were adopted as those of townships, and then were not usually applied to the place named by the Aborigines but to some other place in the same district at best. Triabunna and Corinna(?) seem to be the only Aboriginal place names which have been exactly applied.

A number of small towns and villages, largely those formed in the second half of last century received names of Aboriginal origin. These were not Aboriginal place names, but Aboriginal words of various meanings adopted as place names. More recently, since about 1920, the Hydro Electric Commission has used Aboriginal words in naming its dams and power stations. Most recently, the Tasmanian Nomenclature Board has adopted the Aboriginal place names recorded by G.A. Robinson when giving names to features earlier without name on the topographical maps issued during the last twenty years by the Tasmanian Lands Department. These Aboriginal names have been used particularly with localities in the south-west of the State. The most recent case of supposed Aboriginal naming is the use of Kutikina for the cave in the south-west earlier known as Fraser Cave: the word does not seem to be Tasmanian.

In the list of Aboriginal place names which follows, a standard presentation has been used: a key word has been chosen from the several spellings of it to designate the place; then the various references to it are listed; and finally the place is identified. Most of the names come from G.A. Robinson's records, and they are given in this list in the form written by Robinson who, as usual with his recording of Aboriginal words, attempted to give his idea of their sound by dividing words into syllables.
The identification of the places of which Robinson recorded the Aboriginal name, depends in most cases upon a knowledge of where he was at the time. This can sometimes be determined with accuracy from the descriptions given in his diary and exact plotting. Interpretation is sometimes made more difficult because Robinson did not always identify features with English names correctly.

Identifications are referred to features shown on the Tasmanian 1:100,000 Topographical Maps (Tasmaps, Lands Department, Hobart). No satisfactory system of indexing the places has been devised, and so they have been grouped under map titles. With all its defects, this system will at least enable the student to locate all recorded place names in the various mapping areas.

A good deal could be clarified by following Robinson's perambulations over the ground, and personal observations of this nature by this author since the publication of Friendly mission in 1966, have enabled some modification of the route maps published in it and the location of places of Aboriginal naming. However, there is still much to be done: it would be a pleasant project for active bushwalkers to retrace many of Robinson's journeys.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I should like to thank several friends who have provided me with information about the identification of place names given by the settlers and now forgotten - Mary Cameron, Helen Gee, Sue Gillon, Margaret Glover, Ross Smith, Geoffrey Stilwell and Chris Tassell.

Note: GAR's camp on 21 October, 1831, was to the eastward of Springs Hill
[Little Swanport: V24/25 H60/61]. Gilbert Robertson's report on the capture of UMARRAH (CSO 1/331/7578, pp.168-177) is vague as to the place, but it is clear he was in this region; the capture appears to have been made at a marsh. The most likely place which accords with GAR's camp is Black Johnnys Marsh.

<td>Milligan, J.</td>
<td>Vocabulary of dialects of Aboriginal tribes of Tasmania. Pap. Proc. Roy. Soc. Tasm., 3 (1859), pp.239-274 (place names, pp.270-271). Milligan's list of place names was reprinted in Fenton, J. A history of Tasmania. (Hobart, 1884.) Note: this vocabulary was first published in 1857 in Tasmania, Legislative Council, vol. 1, paper 7 (1856); this version is somewhat shorter, but does not differ materially from the 1859 publication.</td>
