INTRODUCTION

Kelsall and Kemp was originally established in England in 1856 when George Tewke Kemp went into partnership with Henry Kelsall, a textile manufacturer at Rochdale near Manchester. Kelsall and Kemp (Tasmania) Ltd became a registered associate company in 1920, following enquiries made by Lord Rochdale (a Director of the parent company) through the Agent-General for Tasmania in London in the latter months of the First World War. A 13 acre site at Invermay, Launceston, was selected for a new mill, which began woollen textile production in late 1922. The name Rochdale became synonymous with it for many years. For several years the Launceston mill concentrated on making flannel and hard wearing domestic and work cloth. This later became an important part of Tasmania's contribution to the war effort in the Second World War.

In 1963 the minority shareholders' interests in Kelsall & Kemp (Tasmania) were bought by the parent company and it became a wholly owned subsidiary, run by a board of directors resident in Tasmania. It continued as an autonomous company subject only to financial control and broad policy directives from the parent company.

By 1969, following major investment in new machinery, Kelsall and Kemp (Tasmania) Ltd's annual production was worth $2.5 million, and was supplying Australian markets and exporting to Hong Kong and New Zealand. It was Launceston's largest textile manufacturer and became the first Australian wool company to secure an established market in Japan. Nevertheless, like over 100 textile mills in Australia, it also became a victim of controversial Commonwealth Government tariff policies in the early 1970s.

In June 1976, agreement was reached for Kelsall and Kemp (Tasmania) Ltd to become a division of Coats Patons (Australia) Ltd (Bonds Coats Patons group), which subsequently took over certain assets and all its liabilities. Some stock and machinery was bought by Onkaparinga Woollen Company Ltd (Vic). The mill officially ceased production on 15 July 1977. At this time its assets were worth $12 million, and it had an annual turnover of about $4 million. Production had concentrated in the later years on the making of Doctor blankets and fashion fabrics (including schoolwear), and only 58 of over 250 employees remained. Considered to have been highly profitable during its 55 years in operation, the mill had grown to three times its original size and had been an important part of the economic and social life of Launceston. The reinforced concrete buildings were demolished in 1996, the site having been sold some years previously to local business interests.

The collection was donated to the Queen Victoria Museum and Art Gallery in September 1997. Other Kelsall and Kemp records, acquired in 1977, were added in 2008.
